

Addressing the gender dimension of vulnerability: An adaptation framework that works for everyone

Wednesday, November 30, 2011 6:30-8pm, Hex River Room

CARE International and the Women's Environment and Development Organization (WEDO) invite you to join us in exploring the complexities of vulnerability from a gender perspective and contribute to recommendations to input into an adaptation framework that works for everyone.

Following an overview of the gender dimension of vulnerability from Lorena Aguilar, WEDO Board Member and IUCN's Senior Gender Advisor, we will break into four groups to discuss the issue as it pertains to:

- International policy on adaptation
- National policy on adaptation
- 3. Practitioner action on adaptation
- 4. Linkages with thematic areas including health, agriculture, etc.

We invite you to join us for what we anticipate will be a lively discussion!

Founded in 1991, the Women's Environment and Development Organization (WEDO) is an international women's organization whose mission is to ensure that women's rights, gender equality, and environmental, social and economic justice are at the heart of policies, programs and practices at all levels. WEDO works to achieve its mission through strong and consistent advocacy, awareness raising, networking and capacity building.

CARE International's Poverty, Environment and Climate Change Network (PECCN) is a CARE-led 'community of practice' with a care secretariat and global membership. It consists of hundreds of professionals from CARE and partner organizations committed to addressing the challenges of environmental change from the perspective of the world's poorest and most vulnerable people.
